2019: A year to celebrate

2019 marked the 135th anniversary of the Brantford Public Library.

While there are several ways to recognize the significance of the opening of the library in 1884, there is one interesting fact that helps capture the spirit of the times and the public's hunger for information: 1884 was, in fact, the first year the Oxford Dictionary was published.

The public's desire to learn and be introduced to new ideas has not waned over the years. Through world wars, moon landings and the creation and dissolution of several nation-states, the Brantford Public Library has continued to provide resources to the community that connects them to ideas and information.

What was an innovative idea in 1884 continues to be innovative today. Instead of just books and newspapers, the Library has evolved to offer access to information in ways the public wants to consume it. This explains the robust use of our eBook and Audiobook collection, the introduction of several new MakerSpace items and the launch of PressReader - a new digital newspaper and magazine service.

By offering the community equal access to these services, the Brantford Public Library provides an opportunity for an entire community to learn and grow together.

Just imagine what we will look like 135 years from now!
